Week 1 – Week in Review

This week I completed all three research assignments before their required due date. I learned about Trello boards and created one for all of my assignments for the entire course. It is similar to the excel productivity sheet in the first project and portfolio class, but it is more interactive and allows you to share it with others. The videos and research this week were very informative and went over the agile, waterfall, and crud methodologies. It made me realize how they differ from each other and when to use them. The most important thing I learned this week is that effective project management doesn't just happen. It takes a lot of planning and forethought to make a project productive and efficient.

The discussion this week was an introduction, where we explained who we were and more about our lives. This discussion helped me connect more with my classmates and allowed me to see both our differences and similarities. I responded to three of my classmates' introduction discussion posts. It helped me learn more about them as individuals and professionals and helped alleviate the awkwardness of interacting with unfamiliar people.

My next steps are to keep working as productively and efficiently as possible, while maintaining an equal balance between my work life, school life, and personal life. Since I have finished my assignments for the week ahead of time, I will keep strengthening my skills in JavaScript, so that I become more comfortable with the language.
